

Why does a metal bar appear hotter than a wooden bar at the same temperature? Equivalently it also appears cooler than wooden bar if they are both colder than room temperature.

It happens due to high conductivity of metals as compared to wood. On touching with a finger, heat flows to the finger from the surroundings and one feels heat.

Similarly, on touching a cold metal; heat flows from the finger to surrounding much faster than wood.